Canary-Coloring.

[From the London Times.]

Nothing is more curious in the history of canary-breeding than the remarkable processes of artificial coloring, which are among the greatest discoveries of very recent times. Canaries were brought up for exhibition, which showed quaintly fanciful variations in their plumage. Those variations were supposed at first to be mere incidents in the breeding; and it was understood that the way to perpetuate or improve upon any particular hue was to be careful in selecting suitable parents. Even then, and under the most favorable conditions, it was obvious that the colors of the offspring must be very much a matter of chance. It occurred, however, to certain intelligent fanciers that color might be influenced by modification in the diet. Many prescriptions were tried with that object—among others, marigold flowers, strong solution of saffron, cochineal, port wine, beetroot, mustard seed, etc.—but with very imperfect results; when suddenly exhibitors came into the field with a success that startled envious rivals. Suspicions were aroused and accusations freely indulged in. It was said that the colors were the result of unskillful dyeing, though the very audacity of any such attempt should have raised a strong presumption for the innocence of the exhibitor. To satisfy the objectors so far as possible, the unfortunate birds were subjected to severe ordeals, being half stripped in the process of testing their feathers. But experienced judges like Mr. Blackston were satisfied, and gave their awards in favor of those phenomena. Finally one of the breeders of rich red birds, who had undertaken to multiply them almost to order and successfully, proclaimed his secret to the world. It consisted simply in feeding on cayenne. Some birds will color readily, others apparently will hardly color at all, and "by supplying food from which color can be secreted we ascertain what birds have and what have not the capacity of doing that, the manifestation of which constitutes their distinctive quality in a fancier's eye."

[Pottsville, (Pa.) Evening Chronicle.]

For sixteen years, writes Mr. Joseph Alber of this place, I had suffered with Dyspepsia, and spent many a dollar to find relief, but in vain. I was advised by Mr. F. Altstadt, to take Hamburg Drops. I had taken scarcely one of the little bottles before I felt better and soon got well altogether. I am now a warm advocate of Hamburg Drops.

An Eventful Day.

The 3d of September, like the 18th of June and the 4th of July, seems to be one of those days which history has set apart for great occasions. On it occurred the two bloodiest of the countless massacres which have stained the annals of France. On it Napoleon received one of his severest defeats in 1813. On it the Czar Nicholas took a step which made the Crimean war a certainty, and the great convulsion that overthrew the Second Empire broke out in Paris. But its most romantic associations are those connected with Oliver Cromwell. It was the day of his birth and of several of his earlier successes. It was the day of his great victory over the Scots at Dunbar, and his crowning triumph over Charles II. at Worcester; and as if to point more fully the tragic moral of the story, it was, also, the day of his death.

[Cleveland, (Ohio) Plaindealer.]

Capt. Henry M. Holzworth, Chief Detective Force, Cleveland, O., says: St. Jacobs Oil gives surprising relief, does a world of good and conquers pain. It completely cured me of rheumatism.

An ox was captured in the river at Mosby's point, twenty-eight miles above Wilmington, N. C., by a negro man on a flatboat and towed to the city, swimming behind the boat every foot of the way.

TOO MUCH TAFFY.

"What shall I give you, my love, my own?"
Said the captured youth to his lady fair;
"Bangles and bracelets for your white arms,
Or jewels to twine in your golden hair?
A shawl from the looms of the fervid east,
Or satins and silks from those of France?
What shall I give you, my love, my own?"
And he turned upon her his tenderest glance.

And the maiden's eyes they brightly shone,
With the light of joy and love and truth,
And her breath came quick as her ear drank in
The honeyed words of this ardent youth;
Round her slender waist he had placed an arm,
As he toyed with the curls on her sunny head,
"What shall I give you?" repeated he.
"Not quite so much taffy," she archly said.

A Modern Sampson.

Joseph Pospischill, who is now a prisoner in the Austrian fortress of Ofen, on conviction of highway robbery, is said to be the strongest man living. One of the feats for which he was renowned was to support in the air, with his hands and teeth, a table upon which two gypsies danced, while a third fiddled. He and one of his brothers, only less powerful than himself, were wont to bear upon their shoulders a wooden platform, shaped like a bridge, while a cart full of stones, drawn by two horses, was driven over it. The other day, when the jail in which he is confined was undergoing a visit from the municipal prison inspectors, this Hercules volunteered to give the authorities a specimen of his powers, and, upon receiving their permission to do so, picked up with his teeth a heavy mahogany table, nine feet long belonging to the governor, and balanced it aloft for nearly half a minute.

How Long will a Man Lie in the Ground?

[From Chambers' Journal.]

The present writer was once standing in a churchyard with an aged sexton, who complained that it was so full now that his work had ceased to be pleasure. "You see," said he, "it's all 'ed-work now; and though I have parcelled out places for all the parish, it'll be a tight-ish fit to get 'em all snug. As for Johnson Blower, he's a long 'un; and to keep all square I shall 'ev to do what I never did before; he'll go north and south across the feet of his family, where there's an odd bit that 'll just old 'em." Poor old man! though he spoke as if he was immortal, he had been dead for many years, and many of those for whom he piously planned, have survived him.

The death is announced of Prof. William Ballantyne Hodgson, who since 1871 has filled the chair of political and commercial economy and mercantile law in the university of Edinburg, previous to which he had been successively principal of the Liverpool institute and of the Carlton high school of Manchester and examiner in political economy in the university of London. He has also written and published a large number of essays and treatises on educational subjects, and is the author of the "Life and Times of Turgot." He was sixty-five years old.
